'Coordinates Shift With Every Contact' 2025, 3D print, plexiglass, Raspberry Pi 3, Arduino Nano a Display TFC, 800×470mm

The work examines autonomy and control within preconfigured technological systems through the gesture of refusal. Instead of performing the expected action of throwing, the piece stages non-choice as a deliberate interruption of a system built on prediction and causality. Drawing on Greimas's Semiotic Square, the dartboard becomes a model of tension between choice and non-choice, autonomy and control. By denying the throw, the work exposes how apparent freedom operates only within preset parameters and how genuine autonomy can emerge only through breaking the sequence the system anticipates.

Presented in a post-game state, the object functions as an archaeological artifact rather than a playable game. Its exposed materials and non-functional technology reveal the hidden structures behind the illusion of meritocracy, where skill appears to determine outcomes while algorithms and system logic predefine them. Frustration is treated as a productive affect, a way to sense how human gestures are translated into data and how social rituals are absorbed by technological control. The dartboard thus becomes a material analysis of how systems structure behavior, turning leisure into a site of surveillance and choice into a controlled condition.

The scene operates as a map of forgetting; repeated processing, consistent form, eroded reference. Surfaces bear traces of prior use, converted and transcribed until they resemble nothing but endurance; even when the content withdraws. Seen through the window, memory appears here as a state of maintenance rather than remembrance. A directionless view: empty, mold-stained walls, imprints of prior use; reads as archival surface: scanned, converted, transcribed; presence reduced to idleness; a memory shadow.

The work operates between the eerie and the vectoral. The eerie describes absence that continues to act, a presence detached from its origin. The vectoral defines ownership of information and the invisible control over access. Their intersection outlines a form of memory detached from consciousness; traces remain active, detached from emotion or narrative, functioning as automated continuities of what no longer requires meaning.

Memory Vault observes this condition not as a dystopia but as a common state. The surface of the digital archive mirrors the surface of the wall, both store traces, both degrade. Within digital systems, the past endures through circulation, not remembrance. The view through the window exposes memory's architecture: stable yet eroding, persistent yet emptied of meaning; the condition of memory itself: suspended between visibility and loss. Each layer, scan, file, pixel~ stabilises the trace while dissolving its context; data persists, meaning recedes.

My favorite time of the day is either sunrise or sunset. In this work I explore the monotonous passage of time and its significance. Attempting to capture moments when everything reflects itself. At the center of this exploration is a solitary tree, symbolising strength and resilience in the midst of an ever-changing world. images processed using processing pure java code.

Exploring notions of time through nature and scenic photographs from personal archive, spanning from 2005 to recently. Images processed using processing java code.

Habitation: Archiving unconscious thoughts, indicators of life. I explore the notion of memory over time as both a faithful companion and traitor. The print is created using pure java processor code, symbolizing the documentation of life's organic imperfections and mistakes. As time unfolds differently throughout life, I have always been fascinated with capturing moments of emptiness and stillness. Reflecting on my own childhood memories, I recall favorite places where time seemed extended and filled with contemplation. I want to question the shifts and changes of perception of time.

Time capsule: This work was created at the time when the earth seemed to be spinning faster. An etching using the aquatint technique that I created in 2013 is a symbol of the passage of time, mortality and a reminder that not only objects can decay.

Part of the project (sculptures) involves researching the sounds of birds of prey using a spectrogram, with the aim of creating and enabling fictional communication between species. Based on these sound analyses, I designed a script alphabet system that works by dividing letters into high and low frequencies. The sounds were visualized and manipulated at frequency levels using the SPEAR program. This concept was intended to enable the transcription of words into a form that birds of prey could potentially communicate.

Collaboration: Petra Popangelová (co-founder),

Eight Gallery is an art space based in Berlin, established in 2023. It was originally located in the basement of the K55 residential complex at Köpenicker Str. 55, 10179 Berlin, where eight identical rooms formed a cohesive setting.

Now operating as an off-site project, Eight Gallery continues as a concept, changing its location but maintaining its original ethos.

Together with Petra I co-direct and co-curate Eight. I am responsible for all design work (flyers, websites, visual identity), managing social media, documentation (in collaboration with various photographers for individual events), installation, bar organisation, and overseeing all financial matters.

this track is not warm anymore
a set in the exhibition rooms of Eight Gallery is a sonic and spatial exploration that plays with processes of farewell and transformation. Installed in a basement, the piece engages with the nature of underground spaces – places of storage where personal items accumulate over time, carrying memories and traces of past use. The absence of materiality is replaced by the sounds and of everyday life – often overlooked, yet ever-present.

The installation conveys a sense of unpredictability, much like a game where orientation and outcome often remain uncertain.

The work takes inspiration from stratigraphic excavation as a guiding metaphor – a journey through forgotten archives. Each room contains its own sonic layer, juxtaposing opposites that together compose the complete sound arrangement.

Flooded by the repetition and deconstruction of sounds, traces of good-bye letters and sonic files that were buried in their obsolete technological devices, start to appear, like glitches shining in a deep void. The work draws on echoing aesthetics, infused with rupture and tension, recreating an emotional excavation within a modular and drone sound archive. These sounds evoke the obsolescence and nostalgic relics, trailing traces of glitches through which the poem centralizes the whole piece.

this track is not warm anymore aims to enlighten the gallery's raw architecture-dry walls, broken corners, piping, and structural elements that are typically not directly in plain sight. In doing so, the notion of "empty" space is filled by immateriality, transforming the space into a realm of radiance.
